CURRICULUM FOR SECONDARY LEARNING DISABILITIES PROGRAMS

Among teachers, discussion about curriculum materials for secondary learning disabled students frequently begins and ends on the same disheartening note -- that there is nothing or little available that is suitable for use with learning disabled teenagers. Nevertheless, faced with the need for curricular materials for our own secondary learning disabilities classrooms, we initiated a materials search[1] in the summer of 1975. We found that there are numerous materials available in the major subject areas of reading, math, language arts, career education, consumer education and health which are specifically designed for or can be readily adapted for use with the learning disabled junior and senior high school student. To be sure, while we did not find a specific material to suit every curricular need, we did find much more usable material than we had anticipated. It was particularly gratifying to discover just how many commerical companies are making an effort to respond to the curricular needs of the older student with severe skill limitations.

---

[1] The materials search was a project activity of a Title III secondary project entitled "Curricular Development for Secondary Learning Disabilities" which was ongoing in Montgomery County from August, 1974, through June, 1976. Additional products which resulted from the project include: Needs Assessment Survey: Final Report, Learning Disabilities in the Secondary School: A Symposium, and Learning Disabilities in the Secondary School: A Review of the Literature.

The materials search is organized into nine subject areas in the following order:

1. Career Education Materials 7
2. Reading Core Materials 47
   Reading Supplementary 53
3. Language Arts Materials 77
4. Spelling Materials 95
5. Math Core Materials 101
   Math Supplementary 105
6. Social Studies Materials 125
7. Consumer Education 147
8. Science Materials 175
9. Health Materials 189

Each curricular item is catalogued by the title, publisher, and copyright date. In addition, the specific content, e.g., filmstrip, cassette, workbooks, etc., and the interest and instructional level (when this information was available) and a brief descriptive statement are provided for each curricular item. The reader will notice that under the headings of reading and math, core curricular programs are distinguished from supplemental materials. The distinction between core and supplemental materials in the areas of reading and math is an important one for us and we have passed it along to the reader. More specifically, core materials represent complete and comprehensive curricular programs which embody a structure and sequence of content materials frequently ranging over one or more grade levels within a specific content area, e.g., Phoenix Reading Program, the Heath Mathematics Program. Supplemental materials, on the other hand, are not generally as comprehensive but rather stress a limited range or specific area of skill development. While the use of a core curriculum extends over a lengthy period of time, supplemental materials lend themselves to use on an "as needed basis."

In actual practice, core curricular are the mainstay of our Learning Disabilities programs at all levels. Even though our students are secondary age, most of them still require developmental instruction in basic skill areas. We have found that the use of core curricular is the most effective instructional approach which provides the depth and continuity of instruction which our students need.

A final remark, the inclusion of materials in this materials search in no way constitutes our endorsement of those particular products. While we have first hand knowledge of some of the materials listed and are trial testing others, we certainly were not able to review or, more importantly, evaluate the materials per se. It was our intention to provide the teacher with access to curricular materials for secondary students; teachers will have to make their own judgements about the value of specific curricular materials for their students.
